

LiFePO4 Battery Supplier China

Lefor Energy – OEM/ODM LiFePO4 Battery Manufacturer

leforsolar.com

Get Quote >

Exclusive news, data and analytics for financial market professionals LSEG

World ▾ Business ▾ Markets ▾ Sustainability ▾ More ▾

My News

Sign In

Register

Syria talks in Moscow to focus on humanitarian issues

By Gabriela Baczynska

April 5, 2015 11:55 AM GMT+2 · Updated April 5, 2015

Report This Ad

A boy carries two children as he evacuates them from a site hit by what activists said was a barrel bomb dropped by forces loyal to Syria's President Bashar al-Assad in Aleppo's al-Fardous district April 2, 2015. REUTERS/Rami Zayat Purchase Licensing Rights

MOSCOW (Reuters) - The Syrian government and some opposition figures will start a second round of talks in Moscow on Monday focusing on humanitarian issues, although a broader agreement is unlikely as Syria's main opposition group continues to boycott the talks.

Participants say they do not expect any big breakthrough towards ending a conflict that has killed more than 220,000 people in Syria since early 2011.

Advertisement · Scroll to continue

What is the latest on ETFs?
MarketViews

Report This Ad

January's unproductive first round of consultations in Moscow was shunned by the main political opposition group, the Western-backed Syrian National Coalition. It said it would take part only if the talks were to lead to the departure of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, an ally of Russia.

The Istanbul-based SNC has said it will also stay away from the second round of talks, due to last until Thursday. Russia says fighting terrorism in Syria should be the top priority now and has called on the opposition to work with Assad to that end.

Randa Kassis, a former SNC member who now favors talking to Damascus because of the rise of radical Islamists in Syria, said the talks would focus on confidence-building measures including ensuring access for humanitarian aid.

Advertisement · Scroll to continue

"We won't get to a political transition without slowly giving and taking," Kassis, who now heads the Movement of Pluralistic Society, told Reuters.

Moscow has not said which opposition figures will attend. But the line-up is likely to be similar to January, when more than 30 representatives of various groups attended, most from groups tolerated by Assad or who agree that working with Damascus is necessary to combat the rise of Islamic State.

The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights monitoring group said Syrian authorities had released 650 prisoners from at least three prisons in Damascus on March 25-27, including women, children, political prisoners and fighters.

A Moscow-based member of moderate Syrian opposition group the National Coordination Committee said that this was not enough, however, and that any attempt by Damascus to tie the release of these people to the talks would be "just an act".

"We'll see what the government delegation comes up with, including on the humanitarian front, but I am not hopeful for anything special. It'll be more of a continuation of dialogue at best," said the representative, who declined to be named.

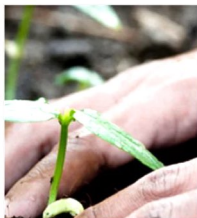

Sponsored Content

Dianomi

What is the latest on ETFs?

Sponsored by MarketViews

Discover top insights on commodity trends and developments.

Sponsored by MarketViews

Stay updated with the newest gold market developments.

Sponsored by MarketViews

Reporting by Gabriela Baczynska, John Irish, Sylvia Westall, Oliver Holmes, Dasha Afanasieva, Editing by Timothy Heritage and Hugh Lawson

Our Standards: The Thomson Reuters Trust Principles.

Suggested Topics: World

Purchase Licensing Rights

Read Next

